NASA ROCKSATX LAUNCHES!

COC students Kyle Strickland and Coulson Aguirre, along with advisor Teresa Ciardi and adjunct faculty member Gregory Poteat were at the NASA Wallops Flight Facility in Virginia for pre-flight testing and launch of our NASA RocksatX Payload on August 12th.

- Our students envisioned and manufactured a payload experiment that deployed when the sounding rocket reached apogee (the point where it was furthest from the earth) and then utilized autorotation to slow the descent of our capsule.
- During their trip, students from COC and the only other community college with a payload (Colorado Community College) had the opportunity to tour the facility, sit in on NASA interviews, watch the screens in the Hubble Space Telescope Mission Control room, and stand above the clean room where the James Webb Space Telescope was recently prepared for launch.
- What an amazing opportunity for our students. Few students have a chance to do something like this, especially at a community college.

NASA RocksatX launch on August 12 at 5:15 am eastern standard time!
